DHS IG raps TSA for its anti-GA campaign

Originally reported July 1, 2009 By: Matt Thurber on AINONLINE

A report issued by the Department of Homeland Security's Office of Inspector General has determined that general aviation operations present such a limited and hypothetical threat to security that the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) does not need to increase its regulatory oversight of general aviation.

The report titled "TSA'S Role in General Aviation Security" was done at the request of Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee (D-Texas), chair of the House Committee on Homeland Security's subcommittee on transportation and infrastructure protection. It is a direct result of an "investigative report" attempting to expose vulnerabilities at three Houston area airports (David Wayne Hooks, Sugar Land Regional and Lone Star Executive.) Three reporters revealed "security breaches" (DHA emphasis) at all three airports, which according to reporters, were able to "approach an airfield or aircraft without identifying themselves" and that "at one point, the reporter noted that a fence enclosed only part of the airfield." In this case, the attempt backfired because no vulnerabilities, threats or risks were found, not only at the Houston airports, but in the entire GA infrastructure.

In its examination of the television reporters' allegations about GA security Homeland Security Inspector General Richard Skinner wrote, "We reviewed the allegations and determined that they were not compelling." The fact that reporters gained access to airfields was not significant; they were not aware that there are passive security measures (24 hr video surveillance, aircraft locks and controlled access to fuel), "which the television reporters did not test. Moreover, the issues identified by the television reporters were not violations of GA guidelines or any federal aviation regulations." The main message of the OIG report is that GA security is not something that the TSA needs to regulate. The report's conclusion: "There have been no [security related] incidents of concern."
